

ProperComm®

for

Victims

Victims of domestic violence are often re-victimized by the necessity of communicating with a co-parent.

Victims can minimize that victimization by requesting the Court order the abuser to communicate via e-mail or text only through ProperComm®.

ProperComm® will edit the e-mails and text messages of an abuser to assure that only appropriate e-mails and text messages are passed through to the victim.

If the Court orders an abuser to communicate through ProperComm®, the victim need only provide ProperComm® with a confidential e-mail address and/or telephone number along with their case number to begin the appropriate communication.

PROPERCOMM®

The solution for victims of domestic violence who are required to communicate with their abusers but who become stressed and fearful of checking emails and/or text messages.

Victims should ask the Courts, their attorneys, or their Victim's Representative to request the Court order the abuser to use ProperComm® for all written communication.

EXAMPLE

Mother's message: Billy has a doctor appointment tomorrow, can you please drop off the insurance card and half of the co-pay?

Father's reply: Your boyfriend can pay now that you are sleeping with him. Since you got that ridiculous order of protection granted, I can't go to the doctor so I'm not dropping off the card or the money. You chose to exclude me from your life-deal with it (you're probably sleeping with the judge).

With ProperComm:

Father's reply: I won't be dropping off the card or the money.
